American Addresses with a Lecture on the Study of Biology Thomas Henry Huxley, 2021-03-19 Book Excerpt: wo kinds of evidence, and what is to be said respecting their value. Suppose that a man tells you that he saw a person strike another and kill him; that is testimonial evidence of the fact of murder. But it is possible to have circumstantial evidence of the fact of murder; that is to say, you may find a man dying with a wound upon his head having exactly the form and character of the wound which is made by an axe, and, with due care in taking surrounding circumstances into account, you may conclude with the utmost certainty that the man has been murdered; that his death is the consequence of a blow inflicted by another man with that implement. We are very much in the habit of considering circumstantial evidence as of less value than testimonial evidence, and it may be that, where the circumstances are not perfectly clear and intelligible, it is a dangerous and unsafe kind of evidence; but it must not be forgotten that, in many cases, circumstantial is quite as conclusive as testimonial evidence, and that, Read Mo

How do we get the attention of a nonscientist? And if we can get it, how do we keep it - not only for the duration of the course or the chapter in a textbook but beyond? How do we convey in our courses and our textbooks not just what we know but also how science is done? These are the challenges we hope to address with our new series of textbooks specifically for the nonscientist. With this series, W. H. Freeman and Scientific American join forces not just to engage nonscientists but to equip them critical life tools.

The American Monthly Microscopical Journal, 1888, Vol. 9 ,2018-02-11 Excerpt from The American Monthly Microscopical Journal, 1888, Vol. 9: Containing Contributions to Biology The opening address was by Garrick Mallery, President of the Philosophical Society. The address upon Professor Baird as administrator was by William B. Taylor, of the Smithsonian Institution. The address upon Professor Baird in science was by William H. Dall. President of the Biological Society. The address upon the personal characteristics of Professor Baird was by John W. Powell, President of the Anthropological Society. Professor Baird was much interested in all the above-named societies. The addresses will soon be published in full. It is hoped that a biography may be prepared by one who appreciated him as no other could. Many public prints record the important events of his life. Congress is apparently about to provide for a bronze statue similar to that of Henry in the Smithsonian grounds. The writer may, perhaps, be permitted to contribute a few personal reminiscences indicative of the character of the man. If one quality was more prominent in his life than others it was his kind ness. He had as kind words for messenger boys as for Senators. He never showed that he felt superior to anybody, and he always appeared to prize the friendship and cordiality of those whom everybody knew to be his inferiors. What often surprised me was that he would spend valuable time in entertaining those who had no such claims upon him. Some book, picture, specimen, letter, or incident was generally handy to furnish him a text for charming conversation. Some came at length to feel, after his health began to fail, that they ought not to let him use his time thus, for he surely would atone for it in over-work; and so, not compelled by business to confer with him for several days. When one endeavored to lessen the multitude of interviews he was holding, the Professor noticed the absences, and playfully rallied the absentee upon his omissions, as if the former, and not the latter, had been the loser thereby. Whoever came into his friendship came to stay, and he never deserted any in adversity, even when they became troublesome to him.
