Translational Research Methods for Diabetes, Obesity and Cardiometabolic Drug Development Andrew J. Krentz, Lutz Heinemann, Marcus Hompesch, 2014-11-29 The world is beset by a pandemic of obesity and type 2 diabetes and the need for new drugs is startlingly clear; recent years have seen a huge increase in research activity to fill this gap. The development of new drugs for diabetes and obesity must be founded upon a sound appreciation of the pathophysiology of these common disorders. The dual defects of insulin resistance and impaired insulin secretion are fundamental to the pathogenesis and progression of obesity-associated type 2 diabetes. There is a need to explain how new drugs can counter insulin resistance and insulin deficiency to a broad range of professionals, from clinical scientists active in early (and later) phase drug development to specialist physicians and increasingly primary care doctors who must tailor drug regimens to the individual patient. Clinical research methods for measuring insulin action and insulin secretion have become well-established in proof-of-mechanism studies; however, selection of the best techniques is by no means straightforward. The purpose of the book is to aid the selection of the most appropriate techniques for assessing insulin action, insulin secretion and body composition in humans (with particular reference to new drugs) in phase 1 and 2 studies and aid the understanding of drug effects and non-drug treatment strategies on key biochemical-hormonal defects of obesity and type 2 diabetes. The book will assume a working knowledge of human physiology relating to glucose metabolism and will be of interest to biomedical scientists, pharmacologists, academics involved in metabolic research and clinicians practicing in these specialties.

Battling Diabetic Peripheral Neuropathy Ondon

Benny,2024-01-25 Diabetes-associated peripheral neuropathy (DPN) is a form of nerve injury that can manifest in affected individuals. Diabetes is a chronic disease distinguished by sustained elevation of blood glucose (sugar) levels. Elevated blood glucose levels can cause progressive impairment of the nervous system, encompassing the peripheral nerves situated beyond the brain and spinal cord. Diabetic peripheral neuropathy is a pathological condition characterized by nerve damage primarily in the extremities, including the feet, legs, and limbs. Although DPN symptoms can vary, they frequently include:

- Individuals diagnosed with diabetic peripheral neuropathy (DPN) may manifest transient paralysis, tingling, or a pins and needles sensation in the extremities.
- Acute regions that are affected may cause sharp, shooting, or burning sensations in certain individuals.
- Sensation impairment: DPN may result in a diminished capacity to perceive pain, temperature, or cold. Due to the fact that individuals may be unaware of wounds, sores, or blisters on their feet, this can increase the risk of injury.
- Muscle weakness may manifest in the regions affected, potentially resulting in impaired balance and mobility.
- Alterations in skin and nails: Toenails may develop a dense, discolored appearance, while the skin on the feet may become dry or cracked.

Optimal diabetes management is strongly associated with the onset and advancement of diabetic peripheral neuropathy. Medication, changes in lifestyle, and routine monitoring of blood sugar levels can aid in preventing or delaying the progression of DPN. Managing additional risk factors, such as hypertension, and adhering to a healthy lifestyle can further promote nerve health. It is critical that individuals with diabetes undergo routine checkups, including foot examinations, with their healthcare providers in order to detect neuropathy and other complications. Identifying and treating diabetic peripheral neuropathy in a timely manner can aid in the prevention of additional complications and enhance the quality of life for diabetic patients.
