Measuring Mobile Broadband Performance Steven Bauer, William Lehr, 2018 The FCC has been running the Measuring Broadband America program since 2011. They have released six well-received yearly reports so far, analyzing the data collected from wired broadband providers. In 2012, the FCC announced an analogous Measuring Mobile Broadband Performance effort and they have been collecting data since 2014. However, the FCC has not released any reports analyzing the mobile data. In this paper we investigate the technical and policy challenges confronting this and other efforts to collect and report on mobile broadband performance. At the core of the debate over mobile performance measurement are questions such as: what constitutes scientifically valid performance measurement for mobile broadband networks? How does one draw valid inferences about user experience, correctly attributing impairments when they exist to different actors or components in the system? Or, how can mobile performance measurement reporting protect privacy while still remaining informative? Answering these questions is more difficult for mobile than fixed broadband for multiple reasons that we document. We explore the current status of mobile broadband performance measurement, building on earlier work that focused on measuring the performance of fixed broadband services.<sup>2</sup> Traditionally, drive and walk testing of mobile networks (conducted by companies such as RootMetrics and P3 Communications) have competed with crowd-sourced measurements (like Ookla's Speedtest app and the FCC's app). For each approach, we examine the measurement methodology, analysis procedures, and data availability. We find that while information describing the general structure of the measurement and reporting methodologies is typically available, important details regarding the measurement methodology and how the raw data is modified to produce the final reports is often missing. We dispute published claims<sup>3</sup> that driving testing is scientific, whereas other methodologies are suspect. We conclude that there is no single best approach and that the availability of a multiplicity of measurement platforms and approaches offers significant benefits. Although there is no single best mobile measurement approach for all questions, we explain why it is important to carefully match the test methodology and available data to the questions being asked. Finally, our analysis explores the implications for broadband policy of this evolving ecosystem for mobile broadband measurement.

Broadband United States Government Accountability Office, 2017-09-22 FCC has a role in promoting competition in the market for broadband, which provides consumers with high-speed Internet through fixed service at home and mobile service through devices such as smartphones. FCC data indicate that about 90 percent of Americans had access to fixed service as of December 2015, but that less than half had more than one choice for such service. As of that time, FCC reported that multiple providers offered mobile broadband coverage to most Americans. Mobile service increasingly allows access to Internet content that was previously accessed primarily through fixed service. GAO was asked to examine factors affecting broadband competition. This report covers (1) selected experts' and stakeholders' views on factors affecting broadband competition and (2) how FCC promotes broadband competition and examines consumers' experience with it. GAO analyzed FCC data as of December 2015; reviewed relevant statutes and FCC documentation; interviewed FCC officials and 23 stakeholders selected to include various types of broadband providers and associations representing industry and consumers; and convened a meeting of 19 experts from academia, industry, and consumer groups with assistance from the National Academy of Sciences.

Measuring Broadband America: a Report on Consumer Wireline Broadband Performance in the U. S. Fcc's Office of Engineering and Technology, 2014-07-05 This 2013 Measuring Broadband America-February Report contains the most recent results from the Federal Communication Commission's (FCC) Measuring Broadband America program. This program, whose first results were published in August 2011, is an ongoing, rigorous, nationwide study of residential broadband performance in the United States. This study, like those conducted before, involves actual performance tests for thousands of subscribers of Internet Service Providers (ISPs) serving well over 80 percent of the residential market. Our initial Measuring Broadband America Report presented the first broad-scale study of actual consumer broadband performance throughout the United States. This effort was followed approximately a year later by a second report, released in July 2012, and now the present report. As explained in the accompanying Technical Appendix, each report in this series is based on measurements taken during a single reference month that has been chosen to represent a typical usage period for the average consumer. The reference month for the first report was March 2011, and the collection period for the second report, initially set for March 2011, was shifted to April 2012 to ensure collection of a sufficient amount of valid data. The reference month for this report is September 2012, five months after the previous testing period. As such, we present this as a supplemental report, noting that substantive network change is best measured in years, not months. Going forward, we plan to repeat testing each year in the month of September, and transition to annual reporting. In this report, we are pleased to include results on satellite technology for the first time, based on test results collected from ViaSat, a major satellite services provider. While in the past we have collected and released raw data on satellite performance, we have not reported on test results from this technology, as we recognized that the industry was on the verge of a major transition. In 2011, the satellite industry began launching a new generation of satellites offering performance as much as 100 times superior to the previous generation, leading to the entry of new satellite-based broadband providers. Consequently, we are now able to include comparisons between satellite and wireline technologies in this report. This Report provides an update on data collected in April 2012 and released in our July 2012 Report. That Report found that five ISPs routinely delivered nearly one hundred percent or greater of the speed advertised to the consumer, even during time periods when bandwidth demand was at its peak, while the average ISP delivered 96 percent of advertised download speed during peak usage periods. This February Report is based on data collected in September 2012, which represents a five month interval from the previous data collection. In the September 2012 testing period, ISPs on average delivered 97 percent of advertised download speeds during peak periods, statistically equivalent to the last report. Overall, we found results in this report materially unchanged from the previous report with one exception, Frontier Communications, which has improved its performance 13 percent from the last reporting period. Encouragingly, we find that another trend previously observed in the July 2012 Report has also continued, as consumers have sustained their migration to higher speed services. In this report for the first time we tested download speeds as high as 75 Mbps (megabits per second), and we know that even higher rates are being offered by service providers to their customers. Based on the results of this report, we make three primary observations regarding the current state of residential broadband service in the United States.

Soon after the Knight Commission delivered its findings, the FCC initiated a working group to identify crosscurrent and trend, and make recommendations on how the info. needs of communities can be met in a broadband world. This report by the FCC Working Group on the Info. Needs of Communities addresses the rapidly changing media landscape in a broadband age.
