Wake Collapse and Subsequent Generation of Internal Waves in a Density Stratified Medium Jin Wu,1968 An experimental technique was developed to model a two-dimensional mixed region collapsing in a continuously density-stratified medium. The process of this mixed region can be divided into three stages. Empirical formulae were derived to describe the process of the first two stages, during which densimetric effects determine the modeling criterion. The collapse process in the final stage is complicated by viscous effects including mixing at the thin wake tip. The pattern of the internal waves generated by the initial impulsive collapse of the mixed region was studied; it can be represented by moving rays connecting either wave crests or troughs. These rays move away from the collapse center and at the same time decrease their slopes. A simpler steady state wave pattern generated by an oscillating plunger was also studied. Taken together, these experimental results are interpreted to show that the energy density of the initial impulsive collapse is skewed toward higher frequencies and that it is peaked at 8/10 of the Brunt-Vaisala frequency. The mechanism underlying the moving ray patterns is explained. (Author).

In addition, the necessary mathematics, aerodynamics and electrical principles have been included to meet the requirements of introductory Aerospace Engineering courses. Numerous written and multiple choice questions are provided at the end of each chapter, to aid learning.

Collapse of Turbulent Wakes in Density-stratified Media Jin Wu,1965 The wake generated by a submerged body moving through a density-stratified medium consists not only of a region of turbulence but also of a region of water with homogeneous density. The purpose of the present research is to study phenomena and modeling criteria relating to the collapse of this wake. Since the wake is very slender in the direction of the body passage, this problem is simplified by studying only the collapse of a particular transverse section of the wake. An experimental technique was successfully developed by using a wall-mixer to model the collapsing phenomenon of a two-dimensional wake in densitystratified media. The process of collapse can be divided into three stages: 'initial', 'principal' and 'final' collapse stages. Empirical formulae were derived to describe the collapse processes of the first two stages, during which the gravitational effect is found to be the predominant modeling criterion. The collapsing process in the final stage was complicated by the increasing viscous effect and observed mixing at the thin wake tip. (Author).
