High Energy Workouts Kimber Rozier,2021 As you would imagine, a high-energy workout's primary defining trait lies in the name. They can be at a gym, outside, or in your own home, but they always feature an upbeat instructor leading a group. The instructor's role is fourfold: to dictate the exercises in the workout, demonstrate and encourage correct form, keep you motivated, and make sure you stay safe. Depending on the size of the group and workout space, that can be a tall ask! That's why good high-energy workouts include some help. For example, almost all of them are set to energetic, upbeat music. First of all, music provides motivation! Multiple studies show that exercising to music you enjoy increases work rate. These beats also keep the rhythm, so you're in step with the person next to you, helping everyone move at the same rate. This effect helps eliminate common issues when working out in a confined space, such as running into each other or getting accidentally kicked. Some high-intensity workouts even happen on stationary equipment, eliminating this issue entirely--
