A Single-sample Multiple-decision Procedure for Selecting the Multinomial Event which Has the Highest Probability

Robert Eric Bechhofer,S. Elmaghraby,N. Morse,1957 The problem of selecting the multinomial event which has the highest probability is formulated as a multiple-decision selection problem. Before experimentation starts the experimenter must specify two constants ($[\theta]^$, P^) which are incorporated into the requirement: The probability of a correct selection is to be equal to or greater than P^* whenever the true (but unknown) ratio of the largest to the second largest of the population probabilities is equal to or greater than $[\theta]^*$. A single-sample procedure which meets the requirement is proposed. The heart of the procedure is the proper choice of N , the number of trials. Two methods of determining N are described: the first is exact and is to be used when N is small; the second is approximate and is to be used when N is large. Tables and sample calculations are provided.

Human iPSC-derived Disease Models for Drug Discovery Markus H. Kuehn,Wei Zhu,2023-11-23 Since their development a decade ago, human induced pluripotent stem cells (iPSC) have revolutionized the study of human disease, given rise to regenerative medicine technologies, and provided exceptional opportunities for pharmacologic research. These cells provide an essentially unlimited supply of cell types that are difficult to obtain from patients, such as neurons or cardiomyocytes, or are difficult to maintain in primary cell culture. iPSC can be obtained from patients afflicted with a particular disease but, in combination with recently developed gene editing techniques, can also be modified to generate disease models. Moreover, the new techniques of 3 Dimensional printing and materials science facilitate the generation of organoids that can mirror organs under disease conditions. These properties make iPSC powerful tools to study how diseases develop and how they may be treated. In addition, iPSC can also be used to treat conditions in which the target cell population has been lost and such regenerative approaches hold great promise for currently untreatable diseases, including cardiac failure or photoreceptor degenerations.
