On the Move! Joyce Navary,2012-06-02 From the Author's Preface:Buying or selling a home is one of the most important decisions you or your family can make. This decision should be made with a well founded background of information from many diverse sources such as, Realtors, family, friends, other buyers or sellers, books, articles, and social media anecdotes. All of these sources hold a place, somewhat influential or VERY influential, in making your decision. You will hear or read about horror stories as well as happy resolutions. It is also incumbent upon the new buyer or seller to rank these sources as far as reliability and validity are concerned. From the viewpoint of a Realtor, and having worked with many buyers and sellers, the most exciting, energetic, and emotional experience is buying your first home. First time buyers are not stressed by the task of selling the current home first in order to buy the next home. They have done some research on their own before settling in with a Realtor and they have their list of questions and financial information at hand. They are ready to embark on this important journey into home ownership knowing they will be in control of the decision-making process. What a great feeling! On the other hand, sellers have no control over what buyers think of their home. Sellers can study and learn the process and prepare the house as much as possible. But they must then sit back and wait. This can be frustrating and very stressful. Suggestions and information from a trusted Realtor can make the sale less stressful and help move the process along more efficiently. Advance preparation is the key to success in either situation, whether it is buying or selling. You should read about the process, listen to stories, ask questions, solicit opinions and keep notes as you move through the stages. In many situations, it can be quite satisfying to accomplish something all on your own based on your own knowledge or experience. However, buying or selling a home is NOT one of those situations. Rely on information from expert sources. As problematic as it might be, we all must rely on others to get things done - install high speed internet, alter a piece of clothing, make airline reservations, get someone to repair the air conditioning in the middle of July - the list goes on and on. We rely on others to help our lives move ahead smoothly. Gathering information by making use of the expertise of others will help you ease through the buying and selling process. There are many people out there who will have a story to tell if you simply mention buying or selling a home. These stories are not always useful or you may not think they are useful at the time. Listen anyway. First, they may be entertaining, but second, they may illustrate a situation you could either avoid or cultivate in the future. Talk about your plans whenever you are in with other people from work, school, church, sports events, or clubs. Most importantly, listen to their stories. The more background you can gather, the more confident you will be going into the buying or selling process. Good luck on your new ADVENTURE!
