Detection of Severe Local Storm Phenomena by Automated Interpretation of Radar and Storm Environment David Harvey Kitzmiller,Jay P. Breidenbach,United States. National Weather Service. Techniques Development Laboratory,1995 Many operational features of the WSR-88D were incorporated specifically to aid forecasters in the detection of severe local storms (damaging winds, large hail, and tornadoes). One interpretive product, the Severe Weather Potential (SWP) algorithm, yields an index proportional to the probability that an individual thunderstorm cell will soon produce any severe weather phenomena. The SWP is based solely on radar information, namely vertically-integrated liquid VIL and storm horizontal extent.

Final Report - Project Cold Rain Robert I. Sax,Ted S. Cress,1971 On at least 25% of the operating days, significant localized increases in rainfall were observed following the seeding. However, natural rain-shower activity (in the target area) during the month was intensive and widespread enough to mask any large-scale contribution directly attributable to the seeding operations. Instrumentation was not sufficiently adequate to attempt an accurate, scientifically-acceptable quantitative analysis of seeding effectiveness.

A Single-station Weather Forecasting Expert System W. H. Jasperson,1987 This report describes the development of an early prototype expert system for the classical single-station weather forecasting problem. The skills required to maximize forecast quality based on such limited data are being lost though they continue to have application to certain military scenarios which include communications interruptions. Knowledge for the expert system was obtained from a meteorologist experienced in single-station weather forecasting by working through case study data. The prototype was developed on a microcomputer and uses forward and backward chaining rules, frames, and other functions and procedures written in LISP. The expert, system is able to emulate the expert for a several day case study used in the development, although much more work must be done to make the system useful for the general meteorological situation.
