Design of a Wizard for Preference Function Modelling Software Zhenju Bian,1999 The Preference Function Modelling (PFM) software is a tool to help decision makers solve multi-criteria problems. This thesis is about the design and implementation of the PFM Wizard package which is now an integral part of the PFM decision-making software. This work includes the whole development cycle of the Wizard. A user test of the current software's user interface was conducted in order to develop the requirements for the design of the Wizard. It was recognized that the PFM software Wizard should focus on the how to knowledge and should tell the user what to do next as a function of previous user actions. It should also automate some tasks. The job of using the PFM software was decomposed into different task types, and a shortest work path was constructed. A rule-based knowledge system was built according to the shortest work path. An evaluation-centered design model was used to develop the software architecture. The Wizard architecture is flexible enough to allow future software updates. The class design, of the Wizard used object-oriented techniques and the model/view paradigm. The PFM Wizard package was implemented using Java 2, and its performance and portability were tested on two different platforms. The software package was also tested by two different user groups to test the Wizard effectiveness. The test results showed that the design goals have been realized.
