An Examination of Naturalistic Windshield Wiper Usage Jacob M. Wetzel, James R. Sayer, Dillon Funkhouser, 2004 As part of a field operational test, 96 drivers were lent instrumented vehicles for approximately 26 days. During this time, a variety of measures regarding vehicle use were recorded, including windshield wiper use, wiper setting adjustments, and headway time margin to preceding vehicles. Windshield wiper activity was examined in detail in order to provide data regarding the naturalistic use of windshield wiper systems. The results have implications for the design and durability of windshield wipers, wiper motors, windshields, and glazing treatments (such as hydrophobic coatings).
