How the Popes Assisted [a Certain Company] with Ad Insertion Software for Cable TV Peter Floriani,2016-11-29 Popes? Cable TV? Software? Subsidiarity?What do the Popes have to do with Cable Television or with Software Development for such an industry?And what does this strange word Subsidiarity mean, anyway?But it really happened. Subsidiarity is an idea presented by several papal documents, starting in 1891 and continuing for over a century - and the essential principles of this idea were used in solving a difficult problem for handing file transport to and within remote sites which were performing local ad insertion on cable television for [a certain company]. On March 2, 2000, that system went live and ran for five and a half years, airing over 230 million spots with a run rate better than 97 percent.That system is long gone, vanished into the dim and almost forgotten past, but the challenges it presented continue to exist. Too many questions are still being asked about difficulties which were solved in practical and effective ways by that system. This book provides answers to those questions, and insights into design methods which have application beyond cable television.

Introduction to Cable Television (CATV) Lawrence Harte,2007 This book explains the fundamentals of cable television systems, the equipment they use, what services they can offer, and how cable television fits and compares with other broadcast technologies. Cable television (CATV) is a television distribution system that uses a network of cables to deliver multiple video, data, and audio channels. This book provides an overview of cable television system technology including cable modems, digital television, high definition television (HDTV), along with how cable systems are evolving to offer advanced services such as ultra broadband and video on demand (VOD). Described are the basic parts of cable television systems including set top boxes, cable modems, distribution systems, and head end equipment. Analog and digital video technology fundamentals are provided including the different types of analog video (NTSC, PAL, and SECAM) and the key types of digital video compression (MPEG-2, MPEG-4 and VC-1). You will discover why and how cable system operators are converting some of their networks from analog to digital to give more channel capacity and to provide for broadband Internet (cable modem) services. Described are the fundamentals of the data over cable service interface specifications (DOCSIS) and what each revision of DOCSIS provides to cable system operators. Explained are the different types of subscription services and value added pay per view (PPV) services including near video on demand (NVOD), video on demand (VOD), and personal video recorders (PVRs). You will learn how cable systems can be upgraded to offer telephone services and why cable operators are transitioning from proprietary telephone systems to industry standard voice over Internet protocol (VOIP) systems. MMDS and LMDS wireless cable technology is described along with how cable operators can efficiently use these wireless systems to extend the range of their cable systems. The future of cable television is discussed including advances in interactive television and addressable advertising. Some of the most important topics featured in this book are: .
