Level One Mix Design Ronald J. Cominsky, Rita B. Leahy, Edward T. Harrigan, 1994 This report summarizes the research devoted to three key aspects of the Superpave Level I mix design: volumetric mix design criteria for aggregates and mixes; compaction; and mix conditioning. The first chapter describes the Delphi group process that was used to select aggregate properties and specification values included in the Level I mix design procedure. Chapter 2 addresses the rationale for the selection of the gyratory compactor, its relations to field control, and validation. The final chapter summarizes the research associated with the development and validation of laboratory conditioning procedures for asphalt concrete mixes. It describes the procedures used to simulate both short- and long-term aging, as well as moisture sensitivity under repeated loading.

Evaluation of the Superpave Gyratory Compactor for Low Volume Roads Stephen Alan Cross,Johnson Choho Lee,2000 There is evidence that some Kansas mixes, which have performed well in the past, will not meet the currently proposed design requirements for a Superpave level I mix. The major problem is low voids in the mineral aggregate (VMA). The major reasons for low VMA are the high amounts of natural sand currently used and the higher compactive effort required by Superpave compared to 50-blow Marshall compaction.
Cores, plant produced (field) mix, the original aggregates and asphalt cement were obtained from four low volume pavements. The cores established the in-place density of the pavements. The field mix was compacted in the Superpave Gyratory Compactor (SGC) to establish the number of gyrations required to reach the field density of the mix. The aggregates and asphalt cement were obtained and Superpave mix designs were performed.
The void properties were evaluated at the original and revised Ndesign gyrations. The effect of reducing the ram pressure from 600 kPa to 400 kPa was evaluated as well.
