The Entomologist's Monthly Magazine, 1874-5, Vol. 11 (Classic Reprint) J. W. Douglas,2018-03-23
Excerpt from The Entomologist's Monthly Magazine, 1874-5, Vol. 11 P.s. - Since the foregoing notes were written, I have made a more extended examination of the insect, and think it to belong to an undescribed species. It is allied to C. Solidi, Hagen, but is somewhat larger, darker in colour, and with a slightly different form of prothorax. The types of solids: are from children's collection, with, unfortunately, no indication of locality. In his Monograph, Hagen, when describing C. Brevis, a species from Central and South America, speaks of two examples enclosed in copal. It seems to me scarcely probable that an American species should occur under such circumstances, and quite possible that these entombed individuals may be identical specifically with those new bred from the wood of the copal tree, for C. Brevis, although decidedly different, is yet allied, and a minute examination of insects enclosed in copal or amber is always attended by uncertainty. Two erroneous names have been given for the Kew insect; firstly that of Estantes lateralis, Walker (of. Proc. Linn. Soc., May 7th, and E. Amorous (cf. Nature, ' No. 288, p. 57 probably a misprint, for there is no species of that name) - R. Mol. May 22nd, 1874. Illinois State Entomologist, 1894

The Canadian Entomologist, Vol. 11 (Classic Reprint) Entomological Society of Canada, 2015-07-17 Excerpt from The Canadian Entomologist, Vol. 11 It was ascertained that the time for the Comm to emerge was from dark to early morning, or between the time of the setting and rising of the sun. Every day the empty cases were removed, and by counting them it was known how many to expect to find, which aided the collector much. As might be expected from the aborted tongue: this Comm is not attracted by sugar. The trunks of the trees from which they emerged, as well as neighboring trees, were sugared extensively during the time of their appearance, but not one came to taste the bait. During this process, in examining the sugared patches, the light from the bulls-eye lantern was thrown repeatedly upon the surface of the Poplar trees, and several were observed at different times in the act of emerging. Just before the final transformation the pupa renews its efforts and pushes itself through the thin bark that has been allowed to remain by the larva. It pushes itself through the opening as far as the base of the abdomen, when, after a while, the exposed pupal skin becomes dry and splits, and the moth escapes, climbing up the bark of the tree, shaking out its wings until developed. The moths usually select the end of a dead and broken limb or protuberance of the roughened bark to rest upon, which their color so closely resembles that it is exceedingly difficult to discover their whereabouts. The empty pupa skins remain at the entrance of the tunnel. The moth itself at first is rather sluggish, and can be captured readily on the bark of the tree in which it has passed its immature state. The moth is very liable to grease, consequently it is advisable to let it thoroughly dry before capturing and pinning. The cavity of the abdomen should be stuffed, and a few drops of benzole previously put in the cavity or placed upon the material used as stuffing. The Entomologist's Monthly Magazine, 1874-1876

J. W. Douglas, 2018-02-15 Excerpt from The Entomologist's Monthly Magazine, 1874-1876: Vols; 11-12 I have examined the position of the abdominal stigmata in the species characterized infra as P. Minor, and adjoin their description, as well as some points that have escaped observation in the anatomy of the genus. Abdominal stigmata two, three, and four, similar in shape to one another, moderately large, very open, elliptical, stigma three rather larger than two or four. Stigmata two and three placed partly in the connecting membrane, and partly in the horny portion of the abdomen stigma four placed just in the horny portion close to the membrane stigma five placed also close to membrane, its position being similar to that of the fourth stigma, but it is smaller than that, though it is large and open. Stigma six is small and 'closed, scarcely quite so near the membrane as the fifth stigma, but yet very little distant therefrom. Stigma seven small, placed close to junction of the dorsal and ventral plates. Prosternum furnished with an elongate narrow post-coxal process, which is extremely densely clothed with very long hairs. Mesosternum produced between the middle coxae, these placed closed to one another, and separated only by a thin lamina. Posterior coxae broader externally than internally; their upper margin oblique in its direction, their outer and hinder angles acute. I have been so fortunate as to accumulate from different sources nine individuals possessing the characters of the genus; and, after carefully examining them, have concluded that these individuals are representatives of five different species it appears, moreover, to me that none of these specimens can be referred to P. Castanea, Hepe, the only species of the genus hitherto described; I have, therefore, drawn up descriptions of these insects, and, in order to make the paper more complete, have copied and added to it the description of P. Castanea. About the Publisher Forgotten Books publishes hundreds of thousands of rare and classic books.
