Flight Studies of the Horizontal-tail Loads Experienced by a Modern Pursuit Airplane in Abrupt Maneuvers Langley Aeronautical Laboratory,1944 Summary: Flight measurements were made on a modern pursuit airplane to determine the approximate magnitude of the horizontal tail loads in accelerated flight. In these flight measurements, pressures at a few points were used as an index of the tail loads by correlating these pressures with complete pressure-distribution data obtained in the NACA full-scale tunnel. In addition, strain gages and motion pictures of tail deflections were used to explore the general nature and order of magnitude of the fluctuating tail loads in accelerated stalls. The results indicated that, if the airplane were not stalled, a total up load of 5700 pounds would be experienced on the horizontal tail in an 8g pull-up and that, with power on, this load would be distributed unsymmetrically with about 800 pounds more up load on the left stabilizer than on the right. When stalling occurred there was an initial abrupt increase in the up tail load of the order of 100 percent of the previous load, which was followed by repeated load and stress variations due to tail buffeting. Under the condition of tail buffeting, the possibility of excessive stresses due to resonance was indicated.
