In part I of this study the theoretical background the stomach and the duodenum. and the technique of examination proper are described. The basic principles of interpretation of DC 1. Radiology has lost its previously rather autonomous position in this field. Part II deals with the results. Chapter 5 consists of 2. As a result of the constant feed-back from the general remarks on the results, and on the complementary role of radiological examination and endoscopy, which the radiologist can and should play, he is in an excellent position to re-evaluate his work. Chapter 6 deals with a quantitative study of and improve his own technique of examination. standard biphase-contrast examinations in patients The author believes that the radiological exam over a period of 3 years. This study was restricted to patients who retain its value as a screening technique and malignant lesions, because it is only in this group a complementary method to gastroscopy and biopsy that the definite criterion, a histological diagnosis, is sought. Only a sophisticated radiological technique will be obtained. The natural history of malignant lesions fulfil these requirements. In 1973 the author developed also makes follow-up studies possible. Results of the study of a standard examination that was called bi diagnosis of Early Gastric Cancer (EGC) are promising, because it combines the advantages of
