Somerset Medieval Wills F. W. Weaver,2018-01-05 Excerpt from Somerset Medieval Wills: 1383-1500 A long preface is unnecessary; 'as the wills speak for themselves and the editor's notes say most of what he wishes to comment on. The frequent mention Of woad implies that the cloth trade and its sister, the dyeing trade, were both very flourishing in the County during the fifteenth century. Wayman Wills and Administrations J. Harvey Bloom,2015-08-05 Excerpt from Wayman Wills and Administrations: Preserved in the Prerogative Court of Canterbury, 1383-1821 The essence of a will is said to be threefold, namely: The testament (1) can be set aside or revoked; (2) It can affect, property not in possession of the testator at the date of execution, but acquired before death; (3) It can make a representative to act for the testator when he is dead. In the twelfth century a man could not give away his freehold land by will; it was not so allowed until 1540. Even then the lawyers held that it could only affect land that was in the testator's possession when his will was made, and this remained good law until 1837; but in any case the will was revocable. It had no action until its owner died. The English will is the old Saxon Cwide. In the oldest form there was no expressed difficulty in a man giving something at the moment of writing, yet retaining possession for life. He could both give away and keep his land. Later it became impossible, since no gift took effect without delivery (seisin). This ancient doctrine is known as the post-obit gift. The second important characteristic of a will was the death-bed confession. Confession consists of three stages: contrition, the actual act of confession, and the amendment. The real purport of many of the clauses in early wills appears to be an endeavour to satisfy the priest of the dying man's real earnestness about his amendment. This amendment is in practice the undoing as far as may be of wrongs done. To this end he leaves sums for tithes forgotten, something towards the repair of the church and other like pious purposes, something for Masses for his soul.
